QUESTION PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

Does this Court's decision in O'Sullivan v. Boerckel, 526 U.S. 838 (1999), allow Arizona state prisoners in noncapital cases to bypass routinely available discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court and submit their claims directly to federal court for habeas corpus review under 28 U.S.C. § 2254?

OPINION BELOW

In Swoopes v. Sublett, 196 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 1999), the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that, in noncapital cases, Arizona state prisoners need not seek discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court in order to exhaust state remedies for federal habeas purposes, even though discretionary review is available to "any party" under Rule 31.19, Arizona Rules of Criminal Procedure. To reach that conclusion, the Ninth Circuit relied on erroneous dictum in a case from Illinois, O'Sullivan v. Boerckel, 526 U.S. 838 (1999), that mischaracterized the holding of an Arizona case. The Ninth Circuit held that O'Sullivan. "implicitly overruled" existing Ninth Circuit law requiring the exhaustion of discretionary review in Arizona. This Court denied certiorari. Sublett v. Swoopes, 120 S. Ct.1996 (2000).

Following Swoopes, the panel in this case reversed and remanded. The panel relied on the same erroneous dictum in O'Sullivan, and perpetuated the same mischaracterization of Arizona law made by this Court in O'Sullivan. App. A.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The State respectfully requests that a Writ of Certiorari issue to review the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in Polston v. Stewart, No. 99–15472. The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit issued its decision on June 15, 2000. App. A. The State timely sought rehearing and rehearing en banc, which the Ninth Circuit denied on July 31. App. B. The State timely filed this petition for writ of certiorari within 90 days of that decision. This Court has jurisdiction pursuant to United States Constitution Article III, Section 2; 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1); and Supreme Court Rule 10.

PROVISIONS INVOLVED

Rule 31.19 of the Arizona Rules of Criminal Procedure provides, in pertinent part:

> a. Time for Filing; Cross-Petition. Within 30 days after the filing of a decision [by the Court of Appeals] or within 15 days after the clerk has mailed notice of the determination of a motion for reconsideration, any party may file with the clerk of the Court of Appeals a petition for review by the Supreme Court.

Rule 111 of the Rules of the Arizona Supreme Court provides, in pertinent part:

> (g) Depublication. [A]n opinion which has been certified for publication by the Appeals Court shall not be published, on an order to that effect by the Supreme Court entered in a case which is before the Supreme Court on a petition for review, cross-petition for review, or petition for special action and which is entered before such opinion becomes final.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On the basis of overwhelming evidence, which included Kevin Dee Polston's three tape-recorded confessions, the testimony of eyewitnesses, videotapes that captured him committing the robberies, and his own testimony, the jury convicted Polston of multiple counts of armed robbery, aggravated assault, and first-degree burglary in May 1991. On June 10, 1991, the trial court sentenced him to concurrent terms, the longest of which was 28 years. He did not appeal.

In 1993, retained counsel filed a petition for post-conviction relief alleging that Polston was incompetent to be tried and that his counsel was ineffective. After an evidentiary hearing in 1994, the trial court denied relief, but granted Polston's motion to file a delayed appeal, which he consolidated with a petition for review from the trial court's denial of post-conviction relief.

In the combined delayed appeal/petition for review, Polston's attorney raised several issues of ineffective assistance. The Arizona Court of Appeals granted review, but denied relief. Polston then sought discretionary review from the Arizona Supreme Court on his claim of incompetence to be tried, and on one claim of ineffective assistance. The Arizona Supreme Court denied review without comment.

Polston, through counsel, sought habeas corpus relief in 1997. The district court held that he had properly exhausted only one of his claims of ineffectiveness because he presented only that claim to the Arizona Supreme Court after the court of appeals affirmed the trial court. Thus, the rest of his claims of ineffective assistance were procedurally barred.

The Ninth Circuit granted a certificate of appealability only on the issue of whether the district court properly held the additional claims of ineffectiveness procedurally barred due to Polston's failure to present them in the petition for review to the Arizona Supreme Court. Following Swoopes v. Sublett, and this Court's opinion in O'Sullivan v. Boerckel, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded, holding that Polston did not have to present the additional ineffectiveness claims to the Arizona Supreme Court in order to satisfy the doctrine of exhaustion. The Ninth Circuit denied the State's timely motion for rehearing and suggestion for rehearing en banc.

REASON WHY THE WRIT SHOULD ISSUE

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The recent per curiam opinion by a three-judge panel of the Ninth Circuit in Swoopes v. Sublett, 196 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 1999), held, in reliance on erroneous dictum in this Court's opinion in O'Sullivan v. Boerckel, 526 U.S. 838 (1999), that the Arizona Supreme Court does not wish to exercise its discretionary appellate jurisdiction in non-capital criminal cases involving denial of post-conviction relief. Consequently, the Ninth Circuit ruled that, in non-capital cases, Arizona state prisoners who seek federal habeas relief need not first exhaust that avenue of potential review, even though it is available to "any party" under Rule 31.19, Arizona Rules of Criminal Procedure. Relying on O'Sullivan and Swoopes, the panel in this case reached the same erroneous conclusion: in non-capital cases, Arizona state prisoners need not seek discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court after denial of post-conviction relief in order to satisfy the requirement of exhaustion. The panel's decision in this case violates this Court's mandate in O'Sullivan that discretionary review, if available, must be exhausted.

This Court should grant certiorari for several reasons. First, this is a matter of great importance in § 2254 habeas litigation deriving from Arizona's courts. The erroneous reasoning of Swoopes, if allowed to go uncorrected and unquestioningly followed, as it was in this case, will adversely affect thousands of § 2254 habeas cases in the District of Arizona by ignoring, wholesale, all procedural defaults at the very stage of review that this Court and federal circuit courts nationwide regard as dispositive for exhaustion purposes—the state's highest court. Arizona prisoners need not seek discretionary review even though it is available to all and is a part of ordinary appellate procedure. According to the Ninth Circuit, Arizona prisoners need not do what O'Sullivan expressly requires: exhaust available state remedies. 119 S. Ct. at 1733–34.

Second, the Ninth Circuit's decision would regularly deprive the Arizona Supreme Court of the opportunity to review federal claims because it effectively encourages Arizona prisoners not to bother filing petitions for discretionary review—the only source of the Arizona Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction in non-capital criminal cases. The Ninth Circuit's shortcut-to-federal-court rule makes a mockery of the doctrine of comity, expressly championed in O'Sullivan—the federal courts' long-held preference for allowing the state courts a full and fair first opportunity to pass on questions of federal constitutional law. 119 S. Ct. at 1732.

Third, the Ninth Circuit's decision in this case, insofar as it unquestioningly follows Swoopes without independent analysis of the Arizona cases cited in that opinion, has no factual support. The Arizona Supreme Court has never discouraged or prohibited timely petitions for discretionary review of meritorious claims. Indeed, every year it grants review on the merits of many such petitions, as shown by the statistics set forth in detail below. Discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court is expressly available to "any party" under Rule 31.19(a), Arizona Rules of Criminal Procedure (promulgated by the Arizona Supreme Court), and is a commonly pursued, ordinary feature of appellate review in Arizona. Where discretionary review is available, state prisoners must seek it before they advance their claims to federal court. O'Sullivan, 119 S. Ct. at 1733–34.

Finally, this Court's dictum in O'Sullivan about Arizona case law is wrong, as explained in detail below. O'Sullivan concerned Illinois procedural law, not Arizona law. In deciding that case, this Court neither received nor solicited any input from Arizona. Had Arizona been a party, the State would have had an opportunity to urge reconsideration of the erroneous dictum. Instead, Arizona has no recourse except to earnestly implore this Court to grant certiorari, analyze Arizona law properly, and to correct the fiction the Ninth Circuit has constructed on erroneous dictum that Arizona had no opportunity to challenge. 119 S. Ct. at 1733.

ARGUMENT

A. THE ARIZONA SUPREME COURT REGULARLY EXERCISES ITS DISCRETIONARY APPELLATE JURISDICTION AND HAS NEVER EXPRESSED ANY "WISH" TO FOREGO IT.

In dictum, while deciding a question of Illinois law in O'Sullivan, this Court erroneously cited Arizona's State v. Sandon, 777 P.2d 220 (1989), as an example of a state court that "d[oes] not wish to have the opportunity to review constitutional claims before those claims are presented to a federal habeas court." 119 S. Ct. at 1733–34. That assertion, adopted by the Swoopes panel, and followed by the panel in this case, is simply wrong.

1. The right to petition for discretionary review by Arizona's highest court is available to all criminal appellants, as a regular part of Arizona's appellate procedure.

Arizona Rule of Criminal Procedure 31.19(a)[1] expressly makes discretionary review available to "any party" to a criminal appeal, and the following statistics from the Arizona Supreme Court's records demonstrate the frequent and abundant invocation of the right to seek review.[2] In 1989, 290 criminal petitions for discretionary review were submitted to the Arizona Supreme Court; 260 were disposed of by order, 21 resulted in opinions, and 17 were resolved by memorandum

1. Rule 32.9(g), Arizona Rules of Criminal Procedure, which governs petitions for review after denial of post-conviction relief, provides that petitions for discretionary review from the court of appeals' denial of review shall be governed by Rules 31.18 and 31.19.

decision. In 1990, 310 were submitted, 246 were disposed of by order, and 19 were resolved by written opinion. In 1991, 349 petitions were submitted, 306 were disposed of by order, and 25 resulted in opinions. In 1992, 366 were submitted, 346 were disposed of by order, and 21 resulted in opinions. In 1993, 550 petitions were submitted, 521 were disposed of by order, and 12 resulted in written opinions. In 1994, of a total of 499 petitions, 488 were disposed of by order, 10 by opinion, and one by memorandum. In 1995, 484 criminal petitions for discretionary review were filed, 474 were disposed of by order, 8 resulted in written opinions, and 3 in memoranda. In 1996, 662 petitions were filed, 613 were resolved by order, 15 resulted in written opinions, and 6 were disposed of by memorandum decision. In 1997, 583 petitions were filed, 626 were disposed of by order, 15 by opinion, and 2 by memorandum decision.

In 1998, the most recent full year of statistics currently available, 584 criminal petitions for discretionary review were filed, 451 were disposed of by order, 14 resulted in written opinions, and 3 were resolved by memorandum. By mid-year (July 1), 1999, 450 new criminal petitions had already been filed, 506 had been disposed of by order, 5 had resulted in written opinions, and one had been resolved by memorandum.

The reality is inescapable: the right to file a petition for discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court is available to any party in a criminal case, and such petitions are filed by the hundreds every year.[3] As shown above, in the past decade alone criminal petitions for discretionary review have resulted in 160 published opinions by the Arizona Supreme Court. Undeniably, petitions for review are a major source of issues for the exercise of that court's

3. See also Rule 111(g), Rules of the Arizona Supreme Court, which allows that court to depublish an opinion that the intermediate Court of Appeals has certified for publication, but only if the case is "before the [Arizona] Supreme Court" on a petition or cross-petition for discretionary review, or by special action. The Arizona Supreme Court could not have promulgated this rule while intending to forego its jurisdictional prerequisite. Instead, this is another indication of the Arizona Supreme Court's desire to control Arizona law by exercising discretionary review.

discretionary jurisdiction. These statistics demonstrate overwhelmingly that petitions for discretionary review in criminal cases are an ordinary, integral feature of the appellate process in Arizona. Under such circumstances, O'Sullivan v. Boerckel requires exhaustion of discretionary review. 119 S. Ct. at 1733.

The central premise in the Ninth Circuit's Swoopes opinion—which the panel in this case followed without independent analysis—appears to be that certain language in the Arizona Supreme Court's 1989 Sandon opinion somehow rendered discretionary review "unavailable" and "outside the standard review process." Swoopes, 196 F.3d at 1010. The Sandon opinion did no such thing; Sandon did not even concern a first petition for discretionary review—which was the sole subject of O'Sullivan!

2. What was the Arizona Supreme Court's holding in Sandon?

After the Arizona Court of Appeals affirmed his convictions, Mark Sandon filed, through counsel, a petition for discretionary review. 777 P.2d at 220. The Arizona Supreme Court ultimately denied review. Id. Up to that point, nothing out of the ordinary had occurred—most petitions for discretionary review are denied. Having had his direct appeal and having sought discretionary Arizona Supreme Court review, Sandon's appeal was "over," as far as the state courts were concerned, just as it would have been under the Illinois appellate system in O'Sullivan.

The issue addressed in Sandon arose later, after the dismissal of Sandon's federal habeas petition for lack of exhaustion. When he returned to the state courts, he filed additional claims in a procedurally irregular second (successive) petition seeking Arizona Supreme Court review. 777 P.2d at 221. The Arizona Supreme Court held that Sandon's second petition was precluded due to procedural default. Id. In other words, Arizona law did not permit Sandon to add more claims in a successive petition—claims that had been raised in the Arizona Court of Appeals, but not included in the original petition for review. Id. As the Sandon court explained, issues decided by the Court of Appeals but not included among those raised in Sandon's original petition for discretionary review were "no longer open to substantive review in this Court, or in any other court in Arizona [unless cognizable in collateral, post-conviction relief proceedings]." Id. Sandon had procedurally defaulted those additional claims by failing to advance them in the original petition for discretionary review. Id.

The Ninth Circuit's perception of Sandon's language as a comment on the O'Sullivan question of availability distorts both fact and law—Sandon is entirely inapposite because it was a successive-petition case. It did not concern the right to file an initial petition for discretionary review—the sole subject matter of O'Sullivan.

The State respectfully urges this Court to read Sandon anew, objectively, to appreciate the inaccuracy of the "Sandon" dictum in O'Sullivan. This Court's reference to Sandon, in O'Sullivan, as an example of a state court reluctant or unwilling to accept timely original petitions for discretionary review of federal claims, was simply wrong. Moreover, the O'Sullivan exhaustion rule turns on the availability of the remedy of discretionary review, not on whether the caseload resulting from defendants' seeking it might be "unwelcome" in the state courts. 119 S. Ct. at 1734. Where the remedy of discretionary review is available under state law, as it clearly is in Arizona, federal law requires its exhaustion. 119 S. Ct. at 1733–34, citing 28 U.S.C. § 2254(c).

B. WHAT COULD EXPLAIN O'SULLIVAN'S MISINTERPRETATION OF SANDON?

The Ninth Circuit has misread Sandon in every instance, apparently believing that it dealt with an original petition for discretionary review rather than a precluded, second attempt to obtain discretionary review. Apparently, this Court, whose focus was on Illinois law in O'Sullivan, was misinformed about Arizona law due to the prior errors of lower federal courts.

The first misinterpretation occurred in Jennison v. Goldsmith, 940 F.3d at 1309–10. In that per curiam opinion, the Ninth Circuit declared, broadly, that Sandon held, "a petitioner need not seek review by the Arizona Supreme Court to exhaust state remedies for purposes of federal habeas." 940 F.2d at 1309. This was manifestly incorrect, as explained above. A footnote in Jennison accurately related Sandon's procedural history, but the footnote concluded with the following misstatement:

> The Arizona Supreme Court dismissed the petition on the ground that for federal habeas purposes state remedies were exhausted as to Sandon's claims once presented to the Arizona Court of Appeals.

940 F.2d at 1309–10 n.2 (emphasis added). Sandon held no such thing; it held only that there were no state remedies available for claims that Sandon's attorney had not advanced in the timely original petition for discretionary review. 777 P.2d at 221. State remedies were "exhausted," the Sandon court wrote, because they were no longer available. Id.

Jennison's per curiam misreading of Sandon was perpetuated in Harmon v. Ryan, 959 F.2d 1457 (9th Cir. 1992), decided without the benefit of any briefing by the State of Arizona, where Judge Reinhardt wrote:

> Sandon held that an Arizona prisoner who, in 1986, had not sought state supreme court review after his conviction was affirmed by the state court of appeals had nonetheless exhausted his state remedies for purposes of federal habeas review.

959 F.2d at 1460. That statement was blatantly incorrect because Sandon had sought discretionary review once before by the Arizona Supreme Court, but only with respect to three of his twelve claims. What Sandon held was simply that the remaining claims—those that had been omitted from the timely original petition for review—could not be raised later in an out-of-time, successive petition for review. "The case in the Arizona courts is over," the Sandon court wrote, because Sandon's attorney had properly exhausted the claims he raised in the first petition for review and had procedurally defaulted the rest. 777 P.2d at 221.

Jennison's distortion of Sandon, perpetuated in Harmon v. Ryan, has been relatively harmless until now because Jennison made clear, in 1991, that the federal courts, not the Arizona Supreme Court, dictate the requirements for exhausting state remedies for federal habeas purposes. 940 F.2d at 1311 n.4. Jennison and subsequent cases also made clear that discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court was available and that seeking it was a prerequisite to exhausting state remedies. 940 F.2d at 1312; Harmon v. Ryan, 959 F.2d at 1461; Coley v. Gonzales, 55 F.3d 1385, 1388 (9th Cir. 1995).

Today, however, we have confusion: the misinformed dictum in O'Sullivan v. Boerckel, and now the Ninth Circuit's Swoopes v. Sublett opinion, both erroneously touting Sandon as an example of a state court that "do[es] not wish to have the opportunity to review constitutional claims before those claims are presented to a federal habeas court." Unfortunately, in O'Sullivan, where the primary focus was Illinois law, this Court may have relied on the erroneous pronouncements in Jennison and Harmon without questioning their accuracy or making any independent inquiry into Arizona law. It is time to return to the source, the actual Arizona law (Shattuck, Sandon, and Rule 31.19, Ariz. R. Crim. P.), and to apply it with precision.

C. THIS COURT MUST NOT ALLOW THE REASONING OF SWOOPES TO STAND.

The ideal solution to this problem would have been an amended O'Sullivan opinion omitting the mistaken reference to Sandon, but Arizona was not a party in O'Sullivan and thus had no avenue of appeal. Nevertheless, this Court can avert further confusion by rectifying the misconstruction of Sandon and, most important, by declaring that despite any suggestion to the contrary in O'Sullivan, Arizona state prisoners, including those who have received life sentences, must petition for discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court in order to exhaust claims that were presented to the Arizona Court of Appeals, and must include in the petition for review all such claims that they wish to exhaust.

The State urges this Court to read the Arizona cases anew, with objectivity, caution, and deference to the Arizona Supreme Court's intimate knowledge of state law, rather than relying on previous misinterpretations by others. State v. Shattuck and Rule 31.19(a) expressly guarantee the opportunity (the right) to seek discretionary review of meritorious appellate claims, either through counsel or pro se. 684 P.2d at 156–58.[4] State v. Sandon had nothing to do with either the original appeal as of right or with the right to timely seek discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court—the two components of Arizona's two-tiered appellate procedure. Mark Sandon himself, through counsel, timely demonstrated the availability of an original Rule 31.19 petition for discretionary review. The Sandon opinion, which rejected a successive petition, simply does not, and cannot, stand for the proposition that a timely initial petition for discretionary review is 4. Frivolous, no-merit claims are discouraged in Arizona, of course, as they are in all state and federal courts, and such issues should not be included in a petition for discretionary review. State v. Shattuck, 684 P.2d 154, 158 (1984) ("Neither retained nor appointed counsel should seek review by this court when the only issues that can be raised are without merit or frivolous"); see Clark v. Ricketts, 958 F.2d 851, 857 (9th Cir. 1991) (to remit frivolous habeas claims to state court for exhaustion would be "senseless"). The Arizona Supreme Court narrowly defines a frivolous issue as "one that 'indisputably has no merit—when any reasonable attorney would agree that the appeal is totally and completely without merit.'" Evans v. Arthur, 678 P.2d 943, 944 n.1 (1984). Only in such an instance (or if the claim is procedurally precluded, as in Sandon) does the court discourage petitions for discretionary review. See id.

Nothing in Arizona law, despite what O'Sullivan suggests, discourages the advancement of arguably meritorious claims by way of a timely petition for discretionary review. See Comment to Rule 31.19, Ariz. R. Crim. P. ("The 1983 amendments to Rule 31.19 contemplate that review will not be sought as a matter of course. Review procedure is intended for those cases in which there is a tenable claim involving substantial issues of law or procedure, or in which serious injustice is claimed to have occurred") (emphasis added). If a claim is tenable, Rule 31.19 is an available avenue of review. Every year, hundreds of Arizona prisoners take advantage of their right to pursue it.

"unavailable" or even "discouraged" in Arizona, or that discretionary review may be bypassed on the way to federal court. Nor does anything else in Arizona law support that notion. The remedy is available and must be exhausted.

The Ninth Circuit's reference in the Swoopes opinion to Moreno v. Gonzalez, 962 P.2d 205 (1998), is inapposite. Moreno, which construed a rule governing collateral review procedures, draws a distinction between "appeals," where the defendant has a right of review, and discretionary petitions for review, where the defendant has only the right to seek review—not an "appeal" because review is only discretionary. 962 P.2d at 207. The Ninth Circuit's reliance on Moreno's definition of "appeal" in a collateral-review context begs the question in the instant case: whether the right to seek discretionary Arizona Supreme Court review is available as a part of Arizona's procedures on direct appeal. O'Sullivan, 119 S. Ct. at 1734.

The Ninth Circuit's reliance on Shattuck, too, is illusory, because the Swoopes opinion quotes only selectively from Shattuck: "[o]nce the defendant has been given the appeal to which he has a right, state remedies have been exhausted." The Swoopes court apparently disregarded the two crucial sentences that directly follow that language in Shattuck:

> The defendant, of course, may petition for review pro per. We will consider the grounds set forth in such petitions.

140 Ariz. at 585, 684 P.2d at 157 (emphasis added). Hundreds "such petitions" are filed every year, and, as promised in Shattuck, all are considered by the Arizona Supreme Court.

Finally, one must also keep in mind that in neither Shattuck nor Sandon did the Arizona Supreme Court have the benefit of O'Sullivan's recent clarification of the federal exhaustion rule—that seeking discretionary review is part of the exhaustion requirement where discretionary review is available. State-court language like the phrases quoted out of context in the Swoopes opinion might warrant strict interpretation if uttered after O'Sullivan, but it is quite a stretch to regard decade-old, pre-O'Sullivan statements about exhaustion as if they had taken O'Sullivan into account.

The ramifications of the Ninth Circuit's Swoopes opinion are unacceptable. Out of whole cloth the Ninth Circuit has created a "bypass-the-Arizona-Supreme-Court" rule that not only violates O'Sullivan but will effectively deprive Arizona's highest court of its appellate jurisdiction in innumerable cases, offend the long-held doctrine of comity, and dramatically increase the number of claims that the federal habeas courts must address on the merits. Moreover, habeas petitioners undoubtedly will argue that this new rule applies retroactively because, if the fiction that the Ninth Circuit has invented is upheld, then Rule 31.19 petitions, thousands of which have been filed, docketed, and adjudicated in the past decade, supposedly have been "unavailable," and "outside the standard review process" since 1989, when the Sandon decision was published. By sheer judicial fiat, the Ninth Circuit has effectively written Arizona's Rule of Criminal Procedure 31.19 out of existence for federal exhaustion purposes.

The trouble would not end there. While some future federal habeas petitioners would forego any state court litigation beyond the Arizona Court of Appeals and go directly to federal court, many could be expected to avail themselves of all the alternative avenues of appeal, which means they would very likely generate chaotic parallel state and federal litigation by seeking Arizona Supreme Court discretionary review and federal habeas review simultaneously.

Not only would parallel litigation potentially render the federal action a complete waste of time if relief were granted by the Arizona Supreme Court; prisoners who file one federal habeas action directly after finding no relief in the Court of Appeals can be expected to file another habeas after being denied relief on a Rule 31.19 petition, because, according to the Swoopes panel's reasoning, a Rule 31.19 petition for review, being "outside the standard review process," would necessarily be regarded as a separate action under state law—something akin to collateral proceedings rather than part of the direct appeal.

Also, consider the effect, under such circumstances, of a belated plain-statement ruling by the Arizona Supreme Court that a claim was procedurally defaulted in the trial court. Should a federal habeas court, having already addressed that same claim on the merits for lack of a finding of procedural default in the Arizona Court of Appeals, revisit the judgement and find the claim precluded from federal review after all? The implications of the Ninth Circuit's opinion raise serious questions whether future federal habeas proceedings in the District of Arizona can be conducted in any orderly manner.

The ensuing dramatic drain on federal judicial resources is easy to foresee—all because of the mythification of an Arizona opinion that had nothing to do with the subject matter of O'Sullivan. This Court should avert these untoward consequences by granting review, vacating the Ninth Circuit's decision in this case, and making clear that seeking discretionary review by the Arizona Supreme Court is a prerequisite to non-capital § 2254 federal habeas litigation in the District of Arizona.

CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing authorities and arguments, Petitioners respectfully request this Court to grant the petition for writ of certiorari.

Respectfully submitted,

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Arizona
John M. Roll, District Judge, Presiding

Submitted June 13, 2000[2]
San Francisco, California

1. This disposition is not appropriate for publication and may not be cited to or by the courts of this circuit except as may be provided by Ninth Circuit Rule 36-3.

2. The panel unanimously finds this case suitable for submission without oral argument pursuant to Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 34(a)(2).

Before: LAY,[3] D.W. NELSON, and THOMAS, Circuit Judges

The district court, on January 8, 1999, denied Kevin Dee Polston's request for habeas corpus relief filed pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2254 (1994); Polston raised claims of incompetency and ineffective assistance of counsel. Among the grounds for denying relief was the court's determination that Polston had procedurally defaulted on all but one of his ineffective assistance claims by failing to present them to the Arizona Supreme Court in his petition for discretionary review. Polston subsequently filed a notice of appeal to the Ninth Circuit and a motion for a certificate of appealability. See 28 U.S.C. § 2253(c) (1994). On May 18, 1999, we granted the motion with respect to whether the district court properly dismissed Polston's ineffective assistance of counsel claims as procedurally defaulted. We find that the court erred.

State prisoners must exhaust their remedies in state court before a federal court may grant habeas relief. See 28 U.S.C. § 2254(b)(1). the Supreme Court has interpreted this exhaustion requirement to mean that state prisoners must invoke one complete round of a state's established appellate review process, including discretionary review in a state court of last resort, before presenting their claims to a federal court in a habeas petition. See O'Sullivan v. Boerckel, 526 U.S. 838, 842-44 (1999). The Boerckel Court, citing Arizona as an example, was, however, careful to note that a state may deem a specific state remedy to be unavailable for exhaustion purposes. See id. at 847-48.

Contrary to the government's assertion here, the Arizona Supreme Court has clearly stated that state remedies are exhausted for federal habeas corpus purposes once the defendant has been given the appeal to which he has a right. See State v. Sandon, 161 Ariz. 157, 158 (189); State v. Shattuck, 140 Ariz. 582, 585 (1984). As there is no right of appeal to the Arizona Supreme Court except in cases where a life sentence or the death penalty is imposed, see Ariz. Rev. Stat. § 13-4031

3. The Honorable Donald P. Lay, Senior United States Circuit Judge for the United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, sitting by designation.

(1989), we have ruled that post-conviction review before the Arizona Supreme court is a remedy that is "unavailable" within the meaning of Boerckel. See Swoopes v. Sublett, 196 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 1999). We therefore reverse the district court's judgement and remand the case for reconsideration in light of our decision in Swoopes.

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

Before: LAY,[1] D.W. NELSON, and THOMAS, Circuit Judges.

The members of the panel that decided this case voted unanimously to deny the petition for rehearing. Judge Thomas voted to deny the petition for rehearing en banc. Judges Lay and Nelson recommended denial of the petition for rehearing en banc.

The full court has been advised of the petition for rehearing en banc and no active judge has requested a vote on whether to rehear the matter en banc. (Fed. R. App. P.35.)

1. The Honorable Donald P. Lay, Senior United States Circuit Judge for the United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, sitting by designation.

The petition for rehearing, and the petition for rehearing en banc, are DENIED.
